CHANGING THE SUPPORT PARADIGM

Today's network computing environments are complex enough to manage when things are running smoothly, but when things start going wrong it can be overwhelming for both IT novices and experts alike. Your company's investment in a business security solution shouldn't end with the purchase and installation of the product, it's also about the support infrastructure you need to help overcome day-to-day obstacles and minimize the disruption to business operations. Whether it's an implementation issue, configuration problem, or a virus outbreak that's bringing your organization to a standstill, it's essential to know that you can get the support you need - when you need it.

Many vendors' security support services are reactive in nature, but in an ever-changing threat landscape they also need to provide proactive support tools and information needed to help make informed decisions and take preventative action if required. In addition to regular product and definition updates, vendor support services should be to be easy to reach and offer multiple paths of communication with rapid response times that ultimately lead to reducing the frustration and burden of a crisis.
